

THE GRAVES

One of the first things any visitor to Clifton Street Cemetery will notice is the layout of the graves and their tombstones. Those in the Upper Ground are facing the eastern and western walls while those in the Lower Ground are facing the northern and southern walls. At present there is no explanation as to why this is but at a guess it would seem to be to ensure the maximum amount of graves being placed within the site.

As for the tombstones themselves it is sad to note that a lot of them are now gone due to the destructive vandalism of the 1970's and the ravages of nature. Fortunately a record of the gravestone inscriptions was made in 1907 and using these and updating them with recent material we are able to present the following detailed information. It is not perfect and is certainly not a full account of everyone buried here but it is as close as we are ever going to get to every inscription which was carved in stone.

Today we are extremely lucky to have the remaining tombstones as the German Blitz, the Troubles, vandals and nature have thrown their worst at them. So called development plans played their part also and records show that certain city councillors wanted the site completely cleared and buildings erected on the site. Fortunately they failed.

Take comfort, Christians, when your friends in Jesus fall asleep
Their better being never ends,
Why then dejected weep?

Why inconsolable as those in whom no hope is given?
Death is the messenger of peace,
And calls the soul to heav'n,

As Jesus died and rose again,
Victorious from the dead,
So his disciples rise and reign,
With their triumphant Head.

■ The remains of the late Mrs Elizabeth Dalton are buried in Clifton Street Cemetery — the last such interment.

Irish News, June 1984

Council secures future for historic graveyard

Belfast: Part of the history of the city ended yesterday with the last burial in Clifton Street graveyard.

Opened in 1797, the small graveyard is the final resting place of many of the city's most famous citizens.

Since the original burial plots were advertised in 1797, the responsibility for the upkeep and general maintenance of the cemetery has been the responsibility of the Belfast Charitable Society.

Increasing problems caused by vandals and the steep costs involved in the day to day running of the graveyard has forced the society to transfer control to the parks department of Belfast City Council.

But as Mr. Tom Nolan of the society pointed out the move will not mean the destruction of the site.

“Final details have yet to be worked but we understand that the graveyard will be developed as a garden of remembrance along the lines of a similar site on the Shankill Road.”

By TERRY McLAUGHLIN

Among those buried in Clifton Street are three members of the United Ireland Association, the most famous being Henry Joy McCracken who was executed in Belfast after the failure of the '78 rebellion. His remains were first interred in the grounds of St. George's Church in High Street before being transferred to Clifton Street in 1908.

Yesterday Mrs Elizabeth Dalton of Mountview Street in the Oldpark area became the last of a long line of Belfast citizens to be laid to rest in the cemetery. She was buried beside her husband in the family burial plot.

And within the next few weeks workers from the parks department will start the task of clearing away the tangled overgrowth covering much of the area. It is hoped the project will be completed by the end of the summer.

MELANCHOLY DEATH OF ALDERMAN SIR JOHN SAVAGE, J.P.

Occurring as it did under circumstances of a peculiarly melancholy nature, we record with feelings of pain and regret the death of Sir John Savage, which took place yesterday morning at the residence of the worthy Alderman, Ardilea, near Greenisland. Sir John, while in a state of unsound mind, died by his own hand. Recently he was noticed by his friends to be moody and despondent; and, although on the previous day he attended his place of business, Prospect Spinning Mill, Crumlin Road, it was evident to those who knew him well that the wonted vigour of his mind was no longer what it used to be. On Wednesday he came up to Belfast by the quarter to nine train. He spent the greater part of the day at his desk in Prospect Mill, and left town by the train which would reach the Whiteabbey station at half-past five in the afternoon. This was later than his usual time. His habit was to travel home by the half-past four train, and to proceed to his residence from Whiteabbey in a pony phaeton, which Lady Savage usually drove to meet him at the station. Missing the phaeton on this occasion, he rode homeward in the railway 'bus. He had some fellow-passengers—two ladies with whom he was acquainted—but, contrary to his ordinary custom, he did not enter into conversation. He hung his head and remained silent all the time. When he entered his own house about six o'clock, Lady Savage and her companion, Miss Kinnear, observed that the symptoms of the previous days had become intensified. Sir John was edgely and restless, and betrayed an aversion to speaking on any subject which his wife or Miss Kinnear might suggest. He made use of the observation to Lady Savage—"It will soon be over with me. I can't stand this much longer; worry is killing me." The ladies were rather anxious about him, and did not lose sight of him until he went to his bedroom, shortly after nine o'clock. A little later Lady Savage retired to her own sleeping apartment, a small room immediately adjoining that in which her husband slept. Between this hour and four o'clock in the morning nothing is known of what took place. Sir John rose very early as a rule, and visited his bathroom; and in anticipation of his rising Lady Savage listened from four until five o'clock, but heard no sound in her husband's room. She then rose, and on visiting Sir John's chamber found the bed unoccupied. She called through the house, and her anxiety grew as she could find no trace of her husband in any of the rooms. Finally she went to the bathroom door, and found that it was fastened on the inside. For the first time her suspicions were aroused. She rushed to the bedroom, and missing the razor from its place on the dressing-table began to realise the terrible event which was afterwards revealed. The assistance of the housemaid was called, and with the aid of a chisel the door was forced. On looking in the women were so terrified with the sight which met their eyes that they turned away in a fainting condition. Sir John, attired only in a night dress, lay at full length, surrounded by a pool of blood. There were two longitudinal cuts on the calf of the right leg, and a frightful gash severed the principal arteries in the right side of the throat. An open razor, the blade covered with blood, lay on the wash-stand in a position which indicated that deceased had been standing at the time the rash act was committed, and that the weapon fell from his hand as the body sank to the floor. The presumption is that the first suicidal attempt was made on the leg, where two varicose veins were opened, and that
